THE STORY OF A DAGGER.

BY WILLIAM ARCHER.

We were sitting, Sir Marmaduke and I,
at the Cafe de Regence, one sultry evening...

There were other types in the shuffling
every one besides those of the French...

"You're not settled in India?" said the
other, with a curious smile...

"The black and white art, you mean?"
said the other, laughing...

"And at the Continental, well, when I've
seen my people home, I'll stroll about...

"No, that's not the answer," said Sir
Marmaduke, leaning back...

remained a mystery to every one. She neither belonged to the local nobility...

"In the latter part of a somewhat average day for the month of August...

"You're getting quite Misset-ish," said
the man...

"You've been to Paris, haven't you?"
said Sir Marmaduke...

"I have been to Paris, and I have been to London, and I have been to...

"The face that launched a thousand ships
and inspired the song of Homer..."

"You're not settled in India?" said the
other, with a curious smile...

"The black and white art, you mean?"
said the other, laughing...

"And at the Continental, well, when I've
seen my people home, I'll stroll about...

"No, that's not the answer," said Sir
Marmaduke, leaning back...

"The black and white art, you mean?"
said the other, laughing...

"And at the Continental, well, when I've
seen my people home, I'll stroll about...

"No, that's not the answer," said Sir
Marmaduke, leaning back...

lost in to the steaming stage at Ballinas,
and stepped aboard. He gave me the name...

"I have been to Paris, and I have been to London, and I have been to...

"The face that launched a thousand ships
and inspired the song of Homer..."
